Description of the Research Team

I am an Associate Professor of International Relations specializing in human rights, international organizations, and global governance. My research examines how international monitoring bodies shape state behavior, with a particular focus on treaty bodies, compliance politics, and the interaction between domestic institutions and international norms. I employ mixed-method approaches, combining large-N quantitative analysis with qualitative case studies and organizational process-tracing.

I have extensive experience in interdisciplinary and cross-national collaborations, including work on democratic backsliding, children’s and women’s rights, trade–human rights linkages, and international monitoring mechanisms. Beyond my research, I lead academic programs and contribute to institutional development in higher education. I am keen to collaborate on projects related to human rights governance, international institutions, global accountability, and data-driven approaches to international norm enforcement.
